ROYAL MATCHMAKING.

We do not wonder that the continual interference of England's queen in German affairs, and her persistent demand that the daughter of Emperor Frederick shall marry a petty and disposed prince, incited indignation in Germany. Prince Alexander was deposed from his kingship in Bulgaria by the influence of the tsar. But he is brother to the husband of Beatrice, Queen Victoria's youngest daughter. The Battenbergers are for princes. Beatrice, like Louise, married down, so far as rank is concerned, and on several occasions, both in public and private ceremonies, in and, on her husband's request, Beatrice, have had to take back seats. Could the old queen see the marriage between Alexander and her granddaughter, the daughter of the German emperor, and with the help of Germany and Austria restore him to his lost kingship, and then work through her own parliament a law raising the title of Battenberg to an even plane with other royal families, her dream would be fully realized. But that would probably cost a mighty war between Russia and probably France on the one side, and Germany and Austria, with such help as England's navy could furnish, on the other; and Bismarck naturally objects to this. The cause is too trifling. It is as puny as the one on which Napoleon the lesser ostensibly precipitated the fatal war of 1871.

In the meantime Bismarck is in the closest kind of a place. He does not shrink from any sort of a row where there is a shade of glory in it, or where, in case there succeeds a mighty drain of blood, and vast treasure has to be expended, but he cannot make war on England's queen; he cannot relieve his feelings by venting his rage in the presence of his sovereign; for death already has him by the throat; he can make no appeal to the German people; there is no comfort in rousing the English ministry by telegraph or telephone, for they would only reply, "Bismarck, can't you stand for a little while what we have to stand all the time?" There is real danger that the impetuous old chancellor will soon imitate the steam boiler that has the safety valve tied down and the stoker pouring coal oil on the fire. He does not want to resign for he and Von Moltke hold Germany in their hands; his glory is inseparably blended with Germany's latest history, and whatever love there is in his now throbbed heart is for his country.

But there sits England's queen insisting on her scheme, and meantime the Cossacks are swarming thicker and thicker on the eastern frontier, and France is running crazy over the prospect of a crisis which will be followed with the old cry of, "On to Berlin." It would be enteraining to hear what Bismarck and Von Moltke say in low tones when they meet. In all their trials to hold Germany invincible amid surrounding hostile forces, they can get along; but now this foreign potentate interferes, all the statesmanship of the great chancellor and all the military resources of that strong empire are turned into foolishness. How they must wish the old girl was dead!

A RECENT accession to the editorial force of a Kansas paper celebrates his entrance upon the field of journalism with a salutary column long, written in a style of which the following is a sample:

I make no claim to literary genius, and cannot promise to weave for you long columns of journalistic fabric, with warp and woof of golden threads, on which are traced in letters of silver elegant perfections and artistically constructed sentences in every graceful curve of which there is the muscle of poetry.

"So is it any wonder," asks a rough western contemporary, "that the voters of Kansas are beginning to put women prominently to the front?"

WHAT to do with the garbage is a question that perplexes a number of our citizens, and one writer who has a wholesome regard for the health of the city, makes it a subject of inquiry in our columns to-day. In some cities crematories are used to burn the refuse; in New York it is loaded on barges and sent away for fertilizing purposes; some cities dump it into the river and give the fishes a chance. It would be well for our city council to advertise for bids for gathering up the waste, and then award the contract to the highest bidder. That seems to be their idea of financial economy.

SOME Frenchman said the Americans always resolve to build a monument to a distinguished fellow countryman when he dies, but never do it. Here is an exact point, Glen Warren fell at the battle of Bunker Hill, upwards of a hundred years ago. Two years later the continental congress ordered an order for a monument to his memory. A week ago the senate passed a bill appropriating $15,000 toward the erection of a monument, but the measure has yet to pass the house. We, certainly, are not a rapid people in the matter of monuments.

THE candidate for county clerk on the republican ticket, F. A. Babbitt, is a man eminently deserving of public support and possessing special fitness for the position he seeks. As grand recorder of the marine lodge he has acquired clerical experience and his methodic business-like training gives him the necessary qualities for county clerk. He is popular of the way with a good military record, popular with the people, and his election, we regard, as fore-destined.

ON our county ticket the name of J. Henson Starr is chosen for recorder. This office was created by the last legislature, and if real estate values increase, as all seem to expect, the duties of the recorder will assume public importance. A competent man is needed for this place, and one whose courteous obliging manners will be a service to those having dealings with the recorder's office. Mr. Starr fully meets the requirements, and we hope to see him well supported at the polls.

THE once notorious Judge LeCompte, a leader of the border ruffians in Kansas, who presided over the first constitutional convention held at LeCompton, died in Leavenworth yesterday. He has been identified with that city since its foundation, and during the last twenty years has been a useful citizen. He was 74 years old.

SPRINGFIELD Republican: Sherman, Allison, Hawley, and Culver lunched together in the Senate restaurant the other day, and an observant bystander saw that Hawley paid for the crowd, while Allison set up the cigars. Score one for harmony.

Indian Commissioner Atkins will retire from his office in a few days to canvass for the United States senatorship from Tennessee. The term of Senator Harris will expire next March, and Mr. Atkins is after his scalp.
